Category:.[Can health promotion strategies be useful in the prevention of work-related musculoskeletal disorders?]. Work-related musculoskeletal disorders represent one of the major costs of work force morbidity in Western Europe. The authors review the need for health prevention strategies in the field of work-related musculoskeletal disorders, stressing the effect of job-related factors and the need to develop appropriate strategies at a local level. Policies that are effective in preventing and identifying early musculoskeletal disorders and the importance of integrating prevention with occupational medicine strategies are discussed. Such integration, particularly in the workplace, is still rare in Italy. A principal reason for preventing or delaying the onset of Alzheimer's disease (AD) is the decrease in the level of soluble amyloid-beta (A β). To sustain that level, A β is continually produced and secreted, but in AD its rate of secretion slows down. This results in a buildup of A β in the brain and it is speculated that this accumulation precipitates the onset of AD. The mechanisms that affect A β secretion are not well understood, but they are assumed to involve control of A β production. The mammalian secretory protein syntaxin has been implicated in many of the secretory processes, including exocytosis, but its physiological role in secretion of A β is not known. Since syntaxin belongs
